Editorial

NOW'S THE TIME!

AFTER YEARS of sitting on the sidelines, reading wistfully of the success of nationalist parties elsewhere, we finally know that the same thing can happen here. The London elections produced extraordinary growth in support for the British National Party, becoming the first major contest when the BNP has moved from the fringe to significant minority status.

We still have a mountain to climb, but the pessimists who have wasted years moaning "It can't happen here," have been proven wrong. With the sole exception of Germany - for historical reasons a uniquely special case - every European nationalist party which has broken through the 5 per cent barrier in major elections has gone on to much bigger things.

The rapid swings in the polls in recent years show that the electorate is becoming ever more volatile, and the speed with which William Hague's ratings have soared since he started to steal our populist clothes shows the potential of our appeal.

Just imagine what will happen if he wins the next election on this kind of rhetoric but then fails to deliver the goods - not least because EU regulations and the European Court would prevent it! Under such circumstances, a sensibly presented nationalist message put across by a well-organised party could make a huge jump towards electability. If, on the other hand, the Tory leader's ploy fails to win the election, his party grandees will conclude that a more liberal message is needed, and dump him and his 'hard-line' pose.

The figures for the second preference aspect of the London mayoral election, in which each elector was able to vote for a first and second choice candidate, make very interesting reading. Nearly half of all the BNP's second preference votes came from people who voted for the Conservative candidate, Stephen Norris, as their first choice. Similarly, one-third of the people who gave their first preference vote to our Mike Newland made Norris their second preference. Hague's race card trick clearly impressed a lot of voters, raising expectations that the Tories will be unable to meet.

The figures also show that Hague's language is helping to legitimise what the left calls 'racism' among many working class voters who still can't bring themselves to back the Tory party. A quarter of the BNP's second preference votes came from electors whose first choice was Ken Livingstone. We received about six times as much support from this superficially unlikely source as from Labour voters who stuck with their party. What better evidence could there be that disaffected working-class electors who still won't vote Tory are increasingly receptive to our message?

Finally, a significant amount of crossover voting between the BNP and the UK Independence Party proves that, if the faction-ridden UKIP finally collapses completely, we will pick up a lot of their votes too.

All this goes to indicate that the British National Party's record vote in London does not represent a peak, but just one step up a ladder. How long before we take the next step upwards depends to some extent on external circumstances. But it also depends on how many supporters, who have until now sat on the sidelines, understand that the future is what we make it. The support for a European-style nationalist advance is out there for us to mobilise - if you will help us to do it.

"What a result"

Identity takes an in-depth look at the growth of the nationalist vote in London and the local elections

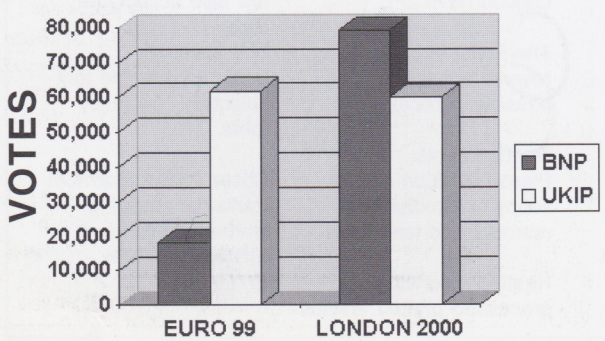

"YOU MUST be pleased with your result." This was the first comment made by a journalist from the Sunday Telegraph when he telephoned the British National Party the day after the Greater London Assembly poll - and indeed we were. The results speak for themselves, but a further indication of just how much progress we are now making comes from the fact that the journalist's report was 'spiked' by his editor. The Telegraph, like the whole of our free and fearless national press, managed to avoid a single mention of the BNP's success.

Our excellent results were made even more striking by the fact that they were achieved in spite of a media blackout that lasted the entire campaign. Various TV, radio and newspaper reports went to absurd lengths to avoid even mentioning the British National Party. When it comes to us, left-liberal media staff increasingly resemble the Victorian prudes who placed curtains around the bottoms of pianos in order to hide their legs, lest the mere sight of them should encourage impure thoughts about the lower limbs of human females.

Internet Polls

If the Greens had enjoyed the Internet opinion poll results that Mike Newland achieved throughout the campaign, we would have heard all about it, but because it is nationalism that is winning the argument in cyberspace, the BNP's consistent 20 per cent support rating disappeared into the memory hole. If it hadn't, who knows how many extra voters would have decided to back such a popular nationalist candidate?

But the media censors couldn't stop our election address going out to five million Londoners, any more than they could prevent around 100,000 Internet users from learning about the BBC's childish refusal to link to our GLA website, despite their putting links on to the sites of every other contestant, and being quite happy to set up such links with terrorists such as Sinn Fein/IRA and Islamic fundamentalists. Nor could they do anything about our hard-working activist teams pounding the streets, or our fleet of well-decorated loudspeaker vehicles which toured the whole of London continually in the closing stages of the campaign, and undoubtedly helped to encourage many supporters to make the effort to go to the polls.

This was not a 'virtual' campaign like that run in London in last June's European election; this time, the British National Party really made its presence felt.

Our reward was to achieve the highest level of support among white Londoners ever secured by a nationalist party.

The full extent of our achievement actually took a few days to emerge, mainly because of considerable statistical confusion caused by the large number of spoiled ballot papers which resulted from the complicated voting system. Once this was sorted out, it became clear that 5.2 per cent of the entire London electorate voted for Mike Newland to be Mayor.

This figure has particular significance for two reasons. First, it is very similar to the support level enjoyed by the Austrian Freedom Party only 15 years ago, just as Joerg Haider became its leader and it began its advance from fringe irrelevance to government partner.

It is often said by individuals who have struggled from rags to riches that "the first £10,000 is the hardest", and much the same is true of new political movements - it's the five per cent threshold that seems to be the hardest to cross.

Once it has been, a movement that dedicates itself to avoiding damaging confrontations, consolidating its support in key areas, and maintaining its unity, is very well placed to make serious progress.

Second, the previous electoral highpoint of British nationalism was reached in London by the old National Front in 1977, with Londonwide support of 5.3 per cent. This, however, was from a London electorate that was still around 80 per cent white, whereas our vote of 5.2 per cent came from a city where the indigenous inhabitants now make up only about two-thirds of voters. We know that we gained a few votes from long-established Commonwealth immigrants protesting at the flooding of various London boroughs with asylum seekers (a few of them even campaigned for us), but there is no doubt that the vast majority of our support came from whites.

Removing the ethnic minority population from the figures, it emerges that the Front's support among white voters back in 1977 was running at just over 6.6 per cent, whereas the same calculation today shows that nearly 7.9 per cent of them have just voted for a BNP mayor. The Front, incidentally, promptly embarked on a series of insane confrontations with the extreme left, failed to make any real effort to sink local roots (despite being a much larger and wealthier organisation, it couldn't even produce a monthly broadsheet, let alone a newspaper like our Freedom), and ripped itself apart in a series of internal feuds. Thus it threw away its chance to take the next step up the political ladder once it became clear that Margaret Thatcher's anti-immigration pose while in opposition had been a con-trick.

BELOW LEFT: BNP VS UKIP (Mayor) The BNP convincingly beat the multiracial globalists of the UK Independence Party. The most striking thing is the increase in the real nationalist vote, but if the faction-torn and demoralised UKIP finally collapses completely, a carefully presented appeal could win over many of their essentially patriotic voters to the British National Party.

Having said all that, the most valid and truly useful comparison is not between the BNP vote today and results from more than twenty years ago, but between our vote on May 4th and in last year's European election. In terms of numbers, it shot up from just under 18,000 to almost 80,000 - a fourfold increase. The improvement is almost as marked in percentage terms, with our share of the white vote rising from 2.4 per cent to 7.9 per cent. And all this in just eleven months!

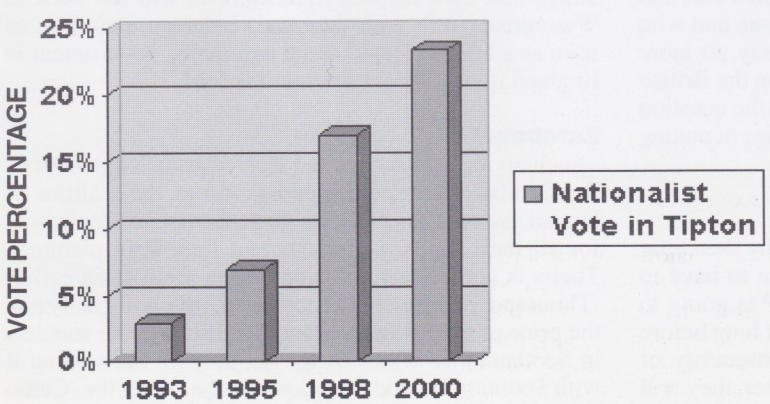

Another very interesting indication of the attitude of Londoners to the BNP nowadays is that, following the delivery of our election address and contact telephone number to five million individuals, calls in favour of our message outweighed critical ones by a factor of 7 to 1. Given that many of the silent 'anti' calls would no doubt have been made by the same handful of cranks, and that a very significant proportion of those hostile callers who identified themselves did so as militant homosexuals, this figure undoubtedly understates the level of feelings in our favour among ordinary, decent Londoners.

Small wonder, then, that the liberal media 'elite' are so nervous about mentioning the British National Party. They don't want to talk about it, but in London on May 4th, we took a very big step towards Big League politics.

For the first time in more than twenty years, a British nationalist party has broken out of the political ghetto walls erected around our kind of politics by decades of opposition smears and our own carelessness or stupidity. And, unlike the last time it happened, we have the organisational structure, experience and political sophistication to make it very hard indeed for them to push us back. No doubt the left-liberals will try, but the experience of modernist nationalism elsewhere in Europe shows that they may well not succeed. They look at us and shudder as they think of what has already happened in Austria, Switzerland, Italy, France, Belgium and Denmark.

Here in Britain they thought that they had clear blue skies for their version of the genocidal multiracial, globalist project, but now they see a cloud on the distant horizon. Although it is at present no bigger than a man's hand, they worry that it could yet become the storm cloud that will wash them down the drain of history. And if a decent number of those individuals reading this from a position of mere sympathy make up their minds to move on from passive support to active involvement in our struggle, they'll be right!

BELOW: TIPTON
The key to success is consistent effort in the community and helping local people. Leafletting, canvassing, paper selling. It all creates support.

The results at a glance:

In the party list election for the Assembly, the BNP gained 47,670 votes. This is 2.87% of the vote, which means that we quite comfortably topped the 2.5% figure needed to retain our £5,000 deposit

In the Mayoral election, BNP candidate Mike Newland took 33,569 first preference votes, and a further 45,337 second preference votes from other electors. This means that, despite all the media demonisation in the past, and a Londonwide media blackout during the campaign, a total of 78,906 Londoners voted for a British National Party mayor!

Mike Newland received nearly 10 per cent of the vote that has 'Red' Ken in charge of our capital. That's an awful lot of Londoners that Livingstone declared war on as 'racists' in his first post-election speech!

Despite the fact that the BBC gave the UK Independence Party a TV broadcast, while denying one to the BNP, we beat UKIP in 13 out of the 14 London constituencies. We also beat the combined extreme left-wing London Socialist Alliance and Socilaist Labour slates.

In last June's European elections, the BNP motivated just under 18,000 Londoners to go out and vote BNP. This time, just 11 months later, 79.000 Londoners backed us - a fourfold increase in our vote!

The BNP vote was even more significant in our heartland areas in East London. In the huge City & East seat - which comprises the boroughs of the City, Tower Hamlets, Newham, and Barking & Dagenham - our party vote topped 7.1%. This replicates our 1993 highpoint Barking & Dagenham by-election (just after Millwall) result over a whole swathe of East London. By comparison, back in the 1997 general election, we took more than 5% and saved our deposits in just two of the seven seats in the area. Another area to see a big increase in the BNP vote was Redbridge & Havering, where we took 4.36% of the party list votes. This indicates a major and widespread broadening of BNP support.

Our mayoral vote in City & East, was even better. Mike Newland took 9,920 first and second preference votes in this constituency, in which a total of 114,022 electors voted for a mayoral candidate. This means that 8.7% voted for a BNP mayor. When we take into account the fact that at least a third of the electorate in this area are from ethnic 'minorities', it emerges that around 12% of real East End voters backed the British National Party!

5.2 per cent of London's entire electorate voted for a British National Party mayor. With ethnic minorities making up one-third of the capital's voters, this means that our share of the white vote was around 7.9 per cent - up more than three times in just eleven months!

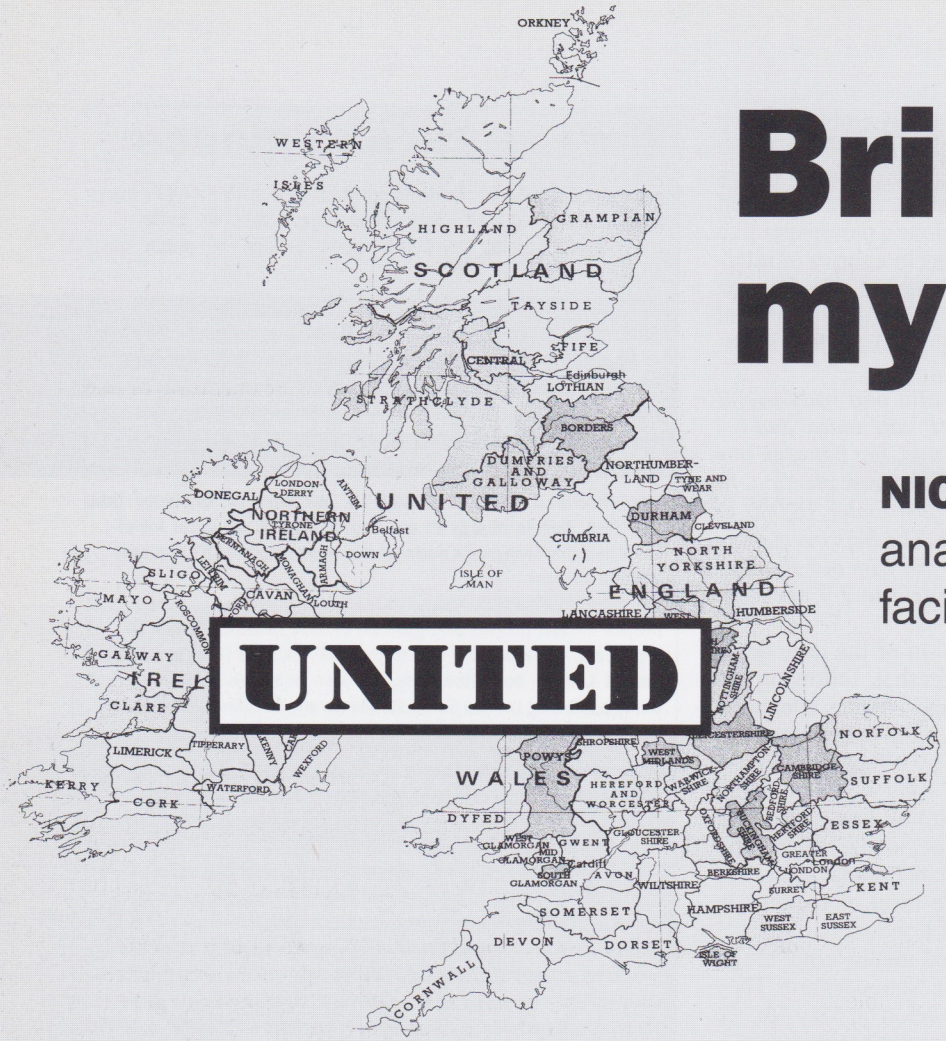

Nationwide Progress

ON THE same day as the GLA contest, local council elections were held in many parts of the country. The BNP's average vote in these also rose very substantially, with big percentage increases in South Birmingham, Stoke-on-Trent and Todmorden.

In some ways, the best result came from Burnley, where Simon Bennett gained 20.5 per cent of the vote - a brilliant result, particularly considering that the party had never contested the seat before.

Another new area for us was Sunderland, where Joe Dobbie took nearly 10 per cent despite an intensive extreme left campaign which saw no fewer than four different smear leaflets delivered throughout the ward, and every single house canvassed by anti-BNP fanatics. A similar figure was also gained in Oldham, a result which reflects great credit on the new but very keen group of activists there.

In the West Midlands, Steve Edwards kept his record for the highest vote the BNP has yet obtained outside of London by increasing his share from 17.2 per cent to 23.6 per cent in Tipton Green, despite a huge vote-rigging scam by Asian Labour supporters. The opposition were almost as shaken by the fact that Simon Darby, standing in a neighbouring ward, doubled his support from 8 per cent to 16 per cent.

Bring me my bow

NICK GRIFFIN continues his analysis of the challenge facing a United Britain

UNITED

Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall
Humpty Dumpty had a great fall
All the King's horses and all the King's men
Couldn't put Humpty together again

Chairman's article

A HANDFUL of people pooh-poohed my contention in the last issue of Identity that powerful elements within the New Labour/media establishment are deliberately fanning the flames of English nationalism in order to further their project to break up Britain and deliver the British peoples, divided and powerless, into the manacles of the European Empire. But anyone who still doubts that this is precisely what is going on will only have to turn their radio on for a few minutes at any time over the next couple of months to hear the strains of William Blake's Jerusalem whipping up the patriotic passions of the English 'mob'.

Don't get me wrong, I think this is one of the most stirring patriotic pieces ever written in the English language, and - if our Scottish, Welsh, Ulster and Irish comrades will put up with it - I'd like to hear it used at large BNP meetings sometimes; but that doesn't alter the fact that, when it is hyped up by the kind of people now doing the hyping, we can be damned sure that they're up to no good. I'm sure that, except for those naïve few who have already swallowed the English nationalist bait and hook, almost everyone who read our last issue and who reads this now will agree with me, so I'll say no more about the present Blairite/EU plot to break up the British Humpty Dumpty. Instead, I want to focus on the question of how, one day, we will overcome the challenge of putting him back together again.

A long haul

In order to do that, the best place to start is by sketching the situation which will then face us. I hate to have to disappoint anyone who thinks that the BNP is going to form a government in the next five years, but long before the strains of the spreading poverty and insecurity of globalism have put us in power in Westminster, they will have led to Scotland becoming an 'independent' EU protectorate. The same is probably true of Wales, although the mutual suspicion that exists between Plaid Cymru and the English-speaking majority makes this less than certain. Northern Ireland will have gone even sooner, although at some point the desperation of a substantial minority of the loyalist majority will explode in armed resistance and communal mayhem. It's more likely that, by the time we come to power on the mainland, the streets of Belfast will be patrolled by foreigners in blue United Nations helmets than by British soldiers.

England herself may by then also have a parliament of her own, or will in turn have been subdivided into a number of regions, each with its own assembly, according to the pattern already set in London. But one way or another, the break up of Britain that began with the loss of Eire will be complete. Some British nationalists who have given this scenario some thought have consoled themselves with the idea that the independent parliaments or assemblies of Scotland and Wales will make such a hash of things that their respective electorates will run back to Westminster rule with their tails between their legs as soon as a newly elected racial nationalist government in England invites them back into the fold.

Eurobeast

Such an idea displays a sad lack of knowledge both of the Eurobeast that confronts us, and of the realities of human nature. The architects of the European Empire are, for all their faults, audacious and long-term planners. Theirs is yet another delusion on the scale of an earlier 'Thousand Year Reich'. Accordingly, they will gladly pay the price of propping up economically unviable statelets in Scotland and Wales. After all, they've been doing it with Southern Ireland for years. Furthermore, the 'Celtic fringe' has been rendered economically unviable by the deliberate destruction of heavy and manufacturing industry that is part of the logic of globalism. Anyone who seriously believes that the English, when they have once been relieved of the burden of subsidising the economic basket cases created by this Westminster treason, will vote for a party which wants to reimpose it, is clearly not a student of practical politics.

There is, of course, a strong possibility that, at some stage, the United Europe project will collapse under the weight of its own contradictions and fundamental lack of realism. The fact that Eire has been making tentative inquiries about rejoining the British Commonwealth suggests that at least a section of the Irish establishment is already looking to take out an insurance policy against this possibility. In addition, a small but growing number of Irish people are realising that the short-term prosperity bubble created by EU membership has been won at a terrible cost in terms of longer-term economic problems and mass immigration that it is impossible to stop under European law. Dublin has recently seen both anti-immigration campaigns and the organisation of a party calling for reunion with Britain; such developments give a hint of the possibility of yet more twists in the long and often troubled relationship between Britain and Ireland.

But even if an EU collapse left Scotland, Wales and Eire needing to team up again with England, it is almost inconceivable that, having got used to the idea of self-rule, they would gladly close down their own parliaments and go back to being minorities in the House of Commons. Even if the people in charge of their devolved governments are finally seen to have made a terrible mess of the job, the most likely popular reaction will be to blame and vote out the parties in question, rather than turning against the institutions themselves.

Now that the genie of local separatism has been let out of the bottle, even severe economic hardship would be more likely to sharpen anti-English feeling than to create a demand for reunification on the old lines.

Pan-British

So let's get down to the bottom line: By the time we come to power in England, the odds are that we will have quite well-organised minority support for pan-British racial nationalism in Scotland, Wales and perhaps even Eire, but that this will not be strong enough to make it realistic to seek to reintegrate any of them voluntarily into a restored Westminster ancien regime. Yet Britain divided in this way would be chronically weak and vulnerable - in fact, not Britain at all - so we could not accept the new status quo.

So what could we do about it? A brain-dead reactionary might be inclined to advocate sending in a few British (i.e. English) tanks to shut down the Scottish parliament and the Welsh assembly, regardless of the fact that such heavy-handedness would create resentments and hatreds that would dwarf any hostility that had arisen up until that point. I'm not making this up, it's not so long since I heard a serious suggestion that a future BNP government could 'solve' the 'Irish problem' by invading Eire and occupying Dublin. Brilliant! Our very own Polish campaign, which would not only bog us down in an unwinnable guerrilla war, but also provide the perfect excuse for the 'international community' to declare economic and military war on us, with the Irish-American lobby joining the other powerful interest groups pushing for a multiracial US occupation of pariah Britain.

And, in any case, even if we could reimpose Westminster rule at gunpoint, what would be the point? Families are held together by love, not by fear, and the nations of Britain are a family like any other. The British unity to which we are committed can only be restored by consent, not coercion. We believe that democracy works best with decisions made at the lowest possible level, so that those making the decisions are directly affected by their consequences and find it worthwhile to participate in the process. This may not appeal to cranks who fantasise about long-gone foreign dictatorships, but anyone who understands the essentially individualistic, even bloody-mindedly stubborn, nature of our unique Anglo-Celtic peoples, will know that democracy is the only form of rule they will accept. Accordingly, we'd better adopt a form of it that involves people and leads to reflection of their views in government - something that distant, centralised rule by Whitehall bureaucrats and Westminster party machines has manifestly failed to achieve.

So when we win in, essentially, England, we're going to have to accept a few unalterable facts of life before we even start on the Great Work of reuniting Britain:

- We can only achieve unity by consent;
- British unity will only be complete when it includes Southern Ireland;
- We will not obtain consent from anyone (except perhaps the Ulster unionists, who will by then in any case probably be in a minority) for a programme which includes closing down their own devolved institutions;
- We will not obtain consent from the Irish to rejoin as junior partners.
- The English electorate will be unwilling to return to rule by a centralised parliament which was disproportionately dominated by what they increasingly regard as a noisy 'Celtic' minority.

We may not like some of these facts, but they are none the less true for all that. Accordingly, it's time to begin to work out our broad proposals for a totally new form of government in these islands, one that will - in the fullness of time - lead to unity of the British family of nations where it is needed, and simultaneously allow diversity where it is desirable or unavoidable.

'Home Rule All Round'

The ideal solution has already been articulated within the intellectual and political tradition to which we are heirs. Back in the 1880's, as the first great crisis for British unity approached its disastrous climax, the radical imperial conservative Joseph Chamberlain concluded that the self-government aspirations of the Irish could be met without breaking up Britain by adopting a policy of 'Home Rule All Round.' This would have devolved matters which could properly be handled at a local parliamentary level away from the Imperial Parliament at Westminster, while leaving essentially geo-political decisions such as defence, foreign policy and the overall handling of the economy to be made on a pan-British level. Had this far-sighted policy been adopted early in the last century, many of the worst domestic horrors suffered in these islands ever since would have been avoided.

The other proposals of the time - which ranged from the brutal suppression of Irish nationalism, through partition, to complete surrender to the forces of fraternal division and religious sectarianism - have all been tried at some stage or another, but the problem remains. The British Brothers' War still rumbles on; even while asylum seekers change the face of Belfast and Dublin, our people organise to maim and kill each other. Regardless of where the balance of right and wrong lies (and we have no doubt that the loyalists are far more sinned against than sinners) this is suicidal insanity. So now it's time for a fresh set of proposals, which I believe are the best means to preserve and extend the pan-British unity to which the BNP's Statement of Principles rightly commits us:

- That our future racial nationalist government, which will be established by obtaining a democratic mandate in England, should commit itself to preserving the by then devolved governmental institutions of all the nations of the British family, for as long as their peoples wish;
- That the powers we repatriate from Brussels and Strasbourg should be handed over to the lowest levels of local government possible;
- That certain of those powers - such as defence, foreign policy and macro-economic decisions - should be vested in a parliament of the Federation of British Nations, a new supreme body which should meet in each nation by rotation, but be based on the Isle of Man;
- That each of the sub-nations within that federation should be free to make up its own mind whether or not to have the head of the House of Windsor as its ceremonial head of state.
- That the Federation be designed so that other nations of predominantly British stock, such as Australia, could join on equal terms at a later date.

Such a programme, suitably fleshed out following further debate, would have all sorts of advantages. It would be one more nail in the coffin of the "the BNP wants a centralised dictatorship" tale that has done us so much political damage in the past. It would offer a practical answer to the Ulster question, being the only solution that could possibly be acceptable to loyalists and republicans alike. We would still have to deal with the gangster, psychopaths and pure bigots who have latched on to both causes, but the fundamental ideological/emotional roots of the conflict would be cut out.

Adopting a federalist road to the reunification of Britain - which by definition would have to include support for a degree of 'Home Rule' for either England as a whole, or the English regions - would allow us to harness for ourselves the powerful wave of English nationalism that is now building up, without falling into the trap of becoming part of the problem of the break up of Britain.

Irish - and white

Finally, providing a sensible long-term solution to the Irish question would allow us to seek out the at present scattered opposition to mass immigration into Southern Ireland, and to try to find practical ways in which to help to build a new movement which will work to ensure the ethnic and cultural survival of our Irish sister nation. This would also make it easier for us to win more support among working class whites of Irish extraction on the mainland, who remain simultaneously the most 'racist' section of the population and the backbone of what extreme-left opposition to us remains. All in all, the advantages of this approach are, to my mind and to those of many colleagues from all over our islands with whom I have discussed it, are self-evident and enormous. Whether you agree or disagree, I would like to hear your views.

This article, like the first part published last issue, is not intended to be the last word on the subject, but the just beginning of a debate. But let no-one think that this debate is idle or abstract. With all the other parties in fundamental agreement on so many issues, it falls to the British National Party to serve as the only genuine opposition and source of new ideas in political life in this country. This is both our duty and our opportunity. Let us do the former and seize the latter.

The sky's the limit

"Mark my words; a combination airplane and motor car is coming. You may smile, but it will come."

Henry Ford, 1940

Dr Moller holding a model of the skycar - the Moller M400

IT'S TAKEN sixty years, but the vision of the patriotic industrial genius finally looks like coming true. After thirty years of research costing £75 million, a fully functional prototype 'flying car' is scheduled to make its first test flight within the next few weeks.

The Skycar is the brainchild of Dr. Paul Moller, a 62-year-old American aeronautical engineer of Danish descent.

The eighteen feet long machine uses eight small rotary petrol engines to power fans which send jets of air to adjustable louvres, built into the fore and aft cowlings.

For take-off the air is directed straight downward, allowing the Skycar to rise vertically before the louvres are adjusted for forward thrust and a cruising speed of 350 mph at an altitude of 30,000 feet.

The process will then be reversed to allow the machine to land in any open space the size of the average lawn.

The key to the feasibility of the whole Skycar idea, however, is a combination of computer power and satellite-aided navigation.

Presented with the alarming picture of amateur pilots cutting each other up in high-speed traffic jams in the clouds, Dr. Moller laughs:

"No, no. It isn't going to be like that. The Skycar will fly itself. You'll give it a destination and it will deliver you to where you want to go. It's a bit like a cruise missile. The system takes care of everything - routing, weather, traffic. If people had to fly them like they drive cars it would be hell up there."

As for the idea of aerial traffic jams, the inventor points out that there's no chance of those either:

"If you took every car in the world and put them all at 30,000 feet, there would be a mile in every direction between them.

That's how much room there is up there. But we won't need anything like all that space. The Skycar will travel in corridors, maybe 25 lanes high.

Mostly, they'll avoid populated areas. You'll hardly know they're there. Compared with the road system we have now, it'll be paradise."

Provided the M400 prototype performs well, the extra money that will then be released by investors will pay to produce the first generation of Skycars.

These will cost in the region of £1 million each, and will almost certainly be snapped up for evaluation by the US military.

But once the Skycar goes into proper mass production, it is estimated that each one will only cost about £30,000 - comparable with many conventional cars.

If this does happen, the time may come when today's road network is as outdated as the British canal system which was one of the wonders of the world in the early days of the First Industrial Revolution.

Of course, it all sounds like the craziest 1950s sci-fi comic, but so, until just a few years ago, did the Internet and the explosion in mobile phone technology which now looks certain to bring combined phone/Internet equipment small enough to wear as an earring onto the market within the next five years.

And, in any case, there are several hard-nosed experts who think that the Skycar is going to play a crucial role in the future of personal transport.

Although Boeing's senior directors decided that the project was too small and uncertain to invest in, for example, one of their research division's executives, Henry Lahore, is personally enthusiastic about the Skycar:

"I love it, it's a beautiful piece of work. I'm really rooting for them."

Dr. Dennis Bushnell, chief scientist at the Nasa Research Center in Virginia, goes much further:

"There's absolutely nothing wacky about it. Paul is a great engineer, and the M400's an outstanding piece of work. It will do for the car-based society what the car did for the horse-based society."

If it does, many of the seemingly intractable problems of the car-based society, from the destruction of the countryside to the expensive and polluting impact of traffic jams, would vanish as naturally as did the once serious problem of excess horse manure in late nineteenth century cities.

As with the development of the Internet, the advent of a mass-produced Skycar could revolutionise life in the developed world.

Change for the better

And the changes it could bring should be for the better - provided visionary but responsible governments take steps to ensure that entrepreneurs like Dr. Moller are encouraged and given free-rein within broad guidelines designed to minimise pollution, maximise safety, and to make the technology available to ordinary people rather than a plaything of the super-rich.

The real problem is not with the feasibility of the technology, that's already relatively well established.

The trouble lies with a politico-economic system which is chronically short-termist; a system which will waste, for example, ten times the research budget of the entire Skycar project on a politicians' folly such as the Millennium Dome, but which will not invest in industrial or technological development without the near-certainty of massive financial rewards in the immediate future.

Then there is the problem of the dominant dogma of laissez-faire liberalism, which holds that it would be wrong for any government to intervene economically and financially in the massive way which would be required to put in place the infrastructure necessary to make something like the Skycar part of the life of millions of people. The biggest obstacle of all is the lack of vision endemic in a system where the only measure of value known to the ruling 'elite' is the money in their personal bank accounts.

Which, of course, is where nationalism is different, regarding as it does money and economics as mere tools to be used for the advancement of the nation and the individuals who form it, within the framework of the duties laid upon us by our debt to the past and our obligations to generations yet unborn.

The Skycar project may flounder on the rocks of liberal short-termism, or it may turn out to be impractical owing to some as yet unforeseen fatal difficulty.

Or it may prove to be one of the foundation stones of a decentralised, human-scale, environmentally aware society that combines respect for tradition and a sense of belonging with a readiness to embrace modern high-tech solutions to the problems which marred the first flowering of Western Man's technological genius.

Anyone who believes that such a society can be built by atomising, socially destructive, short-sighted liberalism is more likely to see flying pigs than flying cars.

But it will be built, country-by-country, as one after another the nations of the West turn their backs on the internationalism of the last century and ride the modern nationalist wave of the future.

'Standing for Mayor'

The BNP's London election campaign

By Michael Newland

Darren Johnson, Green Party candidate (below) - media darling, but received not many more first preference votes than Mike Newland (above)

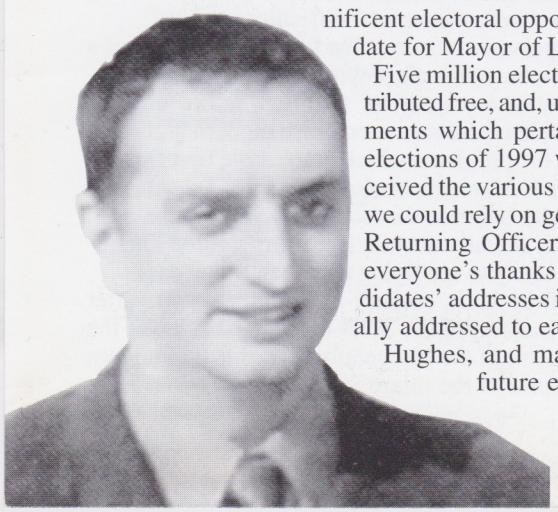

LABOUR HAD two big ideas when it plotted how to run the first election for a London mayor. The Prime Minister, whose ability to walk on water was about to be proved unreliable, intended to impose on London one of the most distinguished placemen in history, and a character reminiscent of Shakespeare's more comic inventions - the hapless Frank 'Dobbo' Dobson. Blair also intended to starve out rivals, particularly from the smaller parties, by depriving candidates of the free distribution of election addresses which is always provided in the far smaller parliamentary elections.

The first wheeze ended, as everyone now knows, in placing in office a collection of crazies who will no doubt live up fully to the expectations of all of us who lived through the reign of the loony-left during Red Ken Livingstone's tenure at the Greater London Council.

A few days before the 1987 general election, I remember overhearing a leading Camden Labour councillor predict that Neil Kinnock would become Prime Minister - only to be replaced by Livingstone within a few days as the result of a cunningly laid plot. Reality is not the strongest suit among the loony-left.

The second wheeze was defeated in Parliament, when opposition parties threatened to bring down the legislation allowing the mayoral election to take place unless all candidates got a free leaflet delivery.

In case anyone wishes to commend Parliament for its upholding of democratic principles, readers should know that the Mother of Parliaments also agreed to increase the voting threshold for inclusion in the Greater London Assembly above that employed elsewhere to help ensure that the British National Party would not gain any seats. It was only a few weeks before the close of nominations when it became clear that the BNP had a magnificent electoral opportunity in standing a candidate for Mayor of London.

Five million election addresses would be distributed free, and, unlike the shambolic arrangements which pertained during the European elections of 1997 when whole areas never received the various parties' addresses, this time we could rely on getting our message out. The Returning Officer, Robert Hughes, deserves everyone's thanks for sending out all the candidates' addresses in a single booklet individually addressed to each voter. Well done Robert Hughes, and may you preside over many future elections!

When party chairman Nick Griffin asked me to be our candidate for mayor, I thought long and hard about how to approach the job. Standing for public office concentrates the mind wonderfully, when one knows all too well that the party's reputation sits on one's shoulders. Should we go for big publicity, when most of it would consist of buckets of the usual lies told by the media, or be much lower key in our approach?

Publicity is always tempting for any political party, which is why the media are good at dangling the promise of it at the unwary to trip them up.

In my opinion, what our party needs is a bit of dignity. We are playing a long game, and screeching headlines don't help. In the event, with small exceptions, the media decided to ignore us, and I was happy to accept. Much of the media is incapable of asking anything but the baffingly stupid sort of pretences at questions which Ali G sends up so cleverly. Tiresome, when one has heard them a million times before.

BBC Censorship

The BBC linked to the web sites of every candidate but the writer's. This earned the corporation a great deal of very bad publicity on the Internet. How cheap these high-falluting BBC types really are behind their fine manners and Jane Austen sensibilities!

One of their staff wrote saying how pointless it was to censor our site when anyone can find it in thirty seconds if they wish to. The only offer of a television interview would have obtained us two seconds on the air in return for being bracketed with some swindlers who will teach you to fly without an aircraft in return for several thousand pounds.

The way forward for the BNP is to create our own large-scale media, and we're well on the way with a growing audience on the Internet, and rocketing sales of Voice of Freedom and Identity. Why scratch around for poisoned tit-bits thrown on the floor by a rigged official media?

The media are like banks.

The latter will always lend you money if you don't need it, and the controlled media will only treat us properly if we don't need them! Negotiate from a position of power and you get better treatment. Of course, if the newspapers had been able to find anything wrong or discreditable about our campaign they would have caned us. They could not. A Mr Angry telephoned one evening, who seemed to imagine that he had spotted something in the election address which would bring us down. Unfortunately for his ambition, my MA is perfectly genuine. If it were not some newspaper would certainly have found out long before Mr Angry, and crowed about a fake CV.

Our campaign was a great success. We know that because of the silence with which the results were greeted by the media. They would have been delighted to announce BNP failure at the polls, but we did very well for a new party which has been demonised for years. A reporter from one of the nationals admitted as much the day after the poll, but not a word of what I said to him appeared in his newspaper.

The bare results obscured just how well we did, and are fully analysed elsewhere, so I make just one or two salient points. Nearly 9% of voters in the eastern part of London placed a cross against my name, and 5.2% London-wide. The Green Party candidate, Darren Johnson, a media darling on account of his politically correct credentials, and tipped to be Livingstone's deputy, did not win many more first preference votes than me.

Lack of Publicity

If I had had the sort of media exposure afforded to student politics exponent Master Darren, I would have slaughtered him in terms of numbers of votes. One of the high points of attending the count was seeing Mr Johnson greeting the delightful Peter Tatchell, who wishes adults who engage in sexual activities with children to be 'sensitively' treated.

Attending the count confirmed just how silly the present media circus really is. Not one reporter spoke to our team of candidates and party workers all night. Not that we cared. Islington New Labour luvvy types puffed up with their own self-importance are no recipe for an evening's entertainment. The mayoral election was a big step forward for the British National Party without any assistance from them.

Over the next weeks and months, it will seep into public consciousness that we have substantial and growing support out there, and that we can conduct a serious election campaign in a professional and orderly manner.

Throughout the campaign, which publicised my name and address to about five million homes, I did not receive a single unpleasant telephone call, and only a handful of letters of the variety usually associated with green ink. To the imaginative person who sent the lawn mower catalogue greetings and thanks. No one even said a harsh word in the street. Those who are contemplating becoming candidates for the BNP please note.

Times have changed for us and our party. That is the result I wanted.

LIVERPOOL: the poor and the wealthy lawyer

Ian Buckley

DURING March, Gordon Brown and Lord Grabiner QC visited Liverpool to look at ways of stamping out the black economy. Gordon must be a touch aggrieved about all these naughty Liverpudlians who are working 'cash in hand' and not contributing, for example, their proper share of the extraordinary £4.5 million given each and every month by the British taxpayer to fund the RAF bombing campaign in Iraq. Killing and maiming Iraqi school kids on behalf of foreign interests doesn't come cheap.

Everything has a price nowadays, and no doubt some grey little auditor has worked out the exact value of the ordnance used last August that blew up half a dozen Iraqi civilians watching the total eclipse of the sun. It's both saddening and irritating that our armed forces have been reduced to their present sorry level of mere mercenaries for Washington. Total eclipse of our honour, independence and freedom, more like.

Anyway, our Gordon becomes ever more bleary, obese and baggy-eyed at each successive appearance, presumably the result of too many whiskies and good dinners imbibed at meetings of the Hudson Institute, the Aspen Institute or the Bilderberg Group.

Evidently, being kicked out of office has the same effect as a lengthy stay at a health farm on system politicians, since former Chancellor Kenneth Clarke now looks slim and fit - he's been 'pumped down' as the present Chancellor has been 'pumped up'!

This whole noxious business of cracking down on workers in the informal economy is strikingly reminiscent of the scene in Oliver Twist in which the Board of Guardians enjoy a sumptuous banquet, while discussing imposing still harsher conditions on their workhouse apprentices. The law, as represented by Lord Grabiner, is a notoriously over-paid and useless profession, largely infested by glib-tongued grabbers who haven't changed one whit since the days Jonathan Swift denounced them. The successful commercial lawyer in the City now earns up to £1 million a year, as opposed to £50 or £80 a week begrudgingly handed out to the unemployed of Merseyside.

The abandoned workers of Liverpool, who are reduced to picking up three or four 'tenners' in exchange for some building or decorating jobs, do not do so out of a desire to cheat the Treasury, but because they are compelled to do so in order to survive.

Has everyone forgotten that Gordon Brown's capitalist pals have exported millions upon millions of jobs to low-wage countries like China and India over the past 25 years?

When Brown was still in nappies, hundreds of thousands of people worked in the innumerable docks and factories of Liverpool, but crazy neo-liberal dogma would have us believe that their children have all chosen to become spivs and idlers.

One wonders if the 'New Labour' comedians who propagate this garbage really believe their own words, or do they merely spout a line because they are forced by the 'market' to follow a pre-determined course, held as they are as if in a vice?

Probably the latter explanation is the most likely and realistic one. It is all pure sham from New Labour and Old Tory, stuck forever in their squalid groove of national putrescence.

Part of that sham is the pathetic 'talking up' of economic prospects, such as the announcement of yet another Euro-funded regeneration project for Liverpool. The grotesque irony here, of course, is that membership of the EU has been the direct causative factor which has drained jobs and investment away to favoured areas in the South-East. All of these 'regeneration' schemes seem to do little more than create Potemkin facades of half-

ABOVE: One-third of all British children live in poverty and deprived conditions. But wealthy middle-class politicians and journalists don't care. They prefer to spend taxpayers' money on 'asylum-seekers' empty hotels and offices, with scenes of dereliction a couple of hundred yards away.

One Liverpool street - London Road - seems to sum all the years of British decline for me. A year before the outbreak of the First World War, when the Mersey was full of cargo ships and liners, and Liverpool was the hub of the Empire, my great-grandmother had her photograph taken at an elegant portrait studio on this street. Now most of the road seems to consist of nothing more than boarded-up betting shops, charity stores and the odd shuttered textile sweatshop.

The people and dusty pavements remain, but the mysterious current of cash has been shut off. Thirty years ago, money was related to trade and the real economy, but now thousands of billions slosh uselessly round and round in the sewer of the financial markets. In the last gasps of laissez-faire any degradation, any stupidity, any futility seems possible, indeed likely, such as the recently announced probable complete closure of the Harland and Wolff shipyard.

Finally, it is also worth noting that the Government teaches us by its example, and the materialistic grab and sleaze ethos promoted and practised on high has very naturally permeated downwards over the years. We are by now almost all of us controlled consumers, our brains due for further scrambling by the multi-channel digital TV to be inflicted upon us in the near future.

Hence, we are assumed to be in such a state of unbreakable stupor that Gordon Brown expects us not to notice the sheer effrontery of 'cracking down' on problems and modes of behaviour directly created by the economic mismanagement imposed on us by failed politicians and their masters in the world of mega-money.

The time is fast approaching when that arrogant liberal assumption will be seen to be sorely mistaken.

No violence here!

by Paul Golding

ONE OF THE main obstacles in the way of a modern nationalist party seeking to move from fringe status to become a major political contender, is the climate of fear instilled by the media in the public mind that they will be in an element of danger if they actively engage in nationalist activities.

This is complete rubbish!

I joined the party just after The Lost Race program during May last year. After corresponding with the party chairman (then publicity director) Nick Griffin, and working for the party in various ways at local level, I was asked to become involved in starting Identity. Subsequently, I have been heavily involved in setting up the Young BNP and have taken on the design and layout of the party newspaper, The Voice of Freedom.

Ever since I joined I have been involved in activities with the party organisation in South East London - leafleting, loudspeakering, and attending public events like the St. Dunstan's leafleting in Central London. I have had my photograph publicised, in print as well as on the Internet. My phone number has been used for both Identity and the Young BNP.

During this period, you would have thought that I would have been targeted in a homicidal campaign of anti-nationalist violence and hatred, crank-calls, hate mail, etc. But, up to the present, I have not received anything negative or offensive, or been in physical danger at all, not a single swear word or dodgy look. I have, however, been greeted on the streets with overwhelming support and praise for the party and its message.

Another example is BNP mayoral candidate and party press officer Michael Newland. He has just stood as a BNP candidate for the mayor of a city that has a foreign population of one-third. His picture, together with the BNP logo, was sent out to all five million of London's electors, including those of his immediate neighbours. Yet, in the entire campaign, he did not receive a single piece of abuse or hate.

I am sure hundreds of our activists could tell the same story.

That is not to say that we have never been the targets of far-left violence, but since the party adopted a policy of avoiding confrontation, our extreme opponents have withered on the vine. There is always a slight chance that the far-left may get frustrated and try something stupid against a high profile BNP figure, but the chance of that sort of thing happening to a local activist is extremely remote - it's more dangerous crossing the road to attend an activity than actually being at one!

So always be on your guard, but don't let the phoney climate of fear worry you, because it was put in place for a reason - not because it is based on reality, but in the hope of stopping people joining us.

So come on in, the water's fine! Make the initial dive, break through the groundless climate of fear, become a member, become active, and confirm for yourself that there is nothing to worry about. You'd be in more danger if you were in the Labour party and met a group of angry pensioners. Now that would be scary!

RIGHT: The BNP isn't just politics. The growing social side to the movement involves family days, dinners, football tournaments and similar events.

RIGHT (Middle): While we campaign as strongly as ever for Equal Rights for Whites, the days of provocative marches are over. In place of street confrontations we are dedicated to community aid and mainstream democratic politics.

THE DARKENING OF IRELAND

HAMILTON BARRETT looks at the political impact of immigration into Ireland

THE RELATIONSHIP between the island of Ireland's two largest ethnic groups, the Nationalist community and the Ulster Scots-Irish, is about to undergo radical change as large numbers of non-white immigrants are allowed in by both governments.

The first lapping wave of mass immigration is already causing a stir in Ireland, although so far there is no organised political opposition to it. But what this is doing to Ireland's political equation is on a par with the biggest events in that nation's history.

In the political world coming, count on the Sinn Fein Marxists to scapegoat and sacrifice large sections of the 'racist' Irish working class, right along with the 'Prods', when the new ethnic equation kicks in. It doesn't take a fortune teller to figure this out: Gerry Adam's organisers already meet with non-white Marxist allies in the USA - people who routinely blame whites - including Irish-Americans - for every social ill.

Adams' allies over here believe that Amercians of European descent are evil oppressors and, as Adams is a Communist rather than an Irish nationalist, he is ready to betray the Irish as an ethnic group at any time. The fake patriots of Sinn Fein embrace Marxist allies such as Russell Means, the Amerindian who wrote the book Europe Must Die.

In the future, the Irish Marxists will embrace even more non-whites, especially as they are able to recruit more of them in Ireland itself, so we must warn Irish-Americans not to help them. Eventually, both of the native communities in the island of Ireland will come to realise that the dying ideology of a narrow, obsolete Irish nationalism is being used as a wolf's cloak by anti-white Marxists. They'll learn that they have to work together against a common threat, leaving behind the sectarianism caused by class war, and oppose every political leader who allows immigration to continue.

If they don't do this, the immigrant numbers will grow until non-whites do in Ireland what they are already doing in America - lording it over those they feel have oppressed them. They will keep arriving unless political action is taken to stop them, because immigration serves the interests of international corporations - forces which also have a lot of expertise in cutting deals with their Marxist opponents when it suits them.

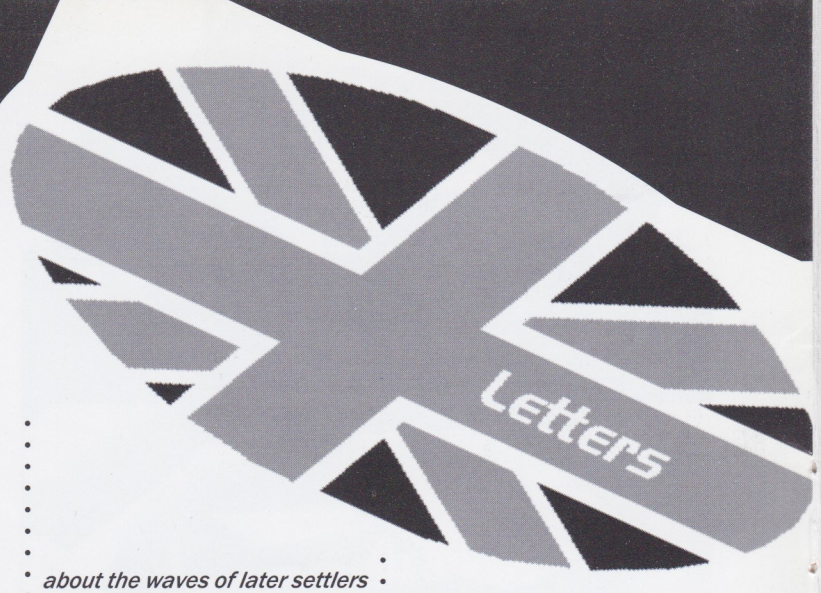

The owners and CEOs of international corporations, in the USA, Ireland or wherever, don't face the ugly human conflicts their greed creates, they simply move their money elsewhere when the gold rush expires. They just don't care about ethnic disasters any more than ecological ones.

Some Irish Americans already murmur that it's too late to save the USA. The wild geese are flying the larger cities over here, although they are often the last whites who can afford to move out. And now, the same problems are beginning in the ancestral homeland as well. Wake up, Ireland, before it's too late!

LETTERS to the EDITOR

SIR: Congratulations on your excellent publication Identity.

The magazine, with its glossy, well laid out format, has been a joy to read. Judging by the comments from fellow nationalists, it has been very well received.

I wish you and the magazine the best of luck for the future.

SIR: Congratulations to BNP Chairman Nick Griffin on his excellent article on the dangers of English Nationalism.

Over the next two years I feel that the tactical attractions of English Nationalism will be exploited by the Tory Party; perhaps with some electoral success. Simon Heffer's polemics on this subject for example are bound to appeal to the materialistically minded English, who are in effect subsidising the Scots to the tune of £8 billion per annum, thanks to the Barnett formula.

Similarly, Blair's constitutional reforms are a real dog's breakfast, with Scots MPs voting on English affairs without any reciprocation.

But the fact remains that these wrongs and anomalies could be rectified by a sovereign, nationalist Britain. The break up of the United Kingdom is only playing into the hands of the Eurofanatics, who talk of regionalisation and subsidiarity whilst dreaming of a centralised undemocratic superstate.

JOHN ARMSTRONG

SIR: In his timely article dealing with the challenge of English nationalism, Nick Griffin states: "The latest DNA studies at Oxford Uniersity show that today's native English, Scots, Welsh, Ulsterfolk and Irish are literally 99 percent descended....from a timy number of Stone Age settlers.." I may be wrong but I thought the Oxford DNA study was on Stone Age skeletal remains found in Cheddar Gorge and local Born people living in the area today, as opposed to a comprehensive British isles study.

We Scots, Irish, English (my ancestry is from these three) and Welsh do indeed have an almost identical gene pool. Blending with that original small stone age constituent came the Pictish Beaker Folk from Iberia to Ireland, Wales and Western Scotland. Then Circa 1500-800 BC saw the arrival of Celtic peoples from the Danube Basin (Southern Germany). Many Roman Legionaries were Gauls, Belgae and Rhinelanders. They were followed by the Angles (who gave England its name), Saxons, Jutes, Vikings, Normans (basically 'Norsemen' settled in Normandy) and Huguenot refugees.

All these people were from varied tribes of the common North European Race and all came from within a few hundred miles of each other.

Their arrival and assimilation in these British Isles, of course, bears no comparison with the post-1948 mass immigration phenomenon.

It is the different blends of these people of a common race that gave us our subtly differing, English, Welsh, Scots, Ulster and Irish Cultures.

Finally, let us not get too carried away on similar DNA percentages. Our distant cousin the chimpanzee shares 94 per cent of our DNA.
JOHN BEAN

EDITOR'S REPLY: We're thinking of two different surveys, and the one to which Mr. Griffin was referring involved a much larger number of samples than the Cheddar study.

According to the wider survey undertaken by Professor Sykes, the genetic make-up of modern day ethnic Britons is 99 per cent identical, on the maternal side, to that of the prehistoric peoples who settled these islands between 40,000 and 10,000 years ago.

Exactly what this tells us about the waves of later settlers from the European mainland who used to feature so strongly in school history books is, however, less clear. Professor Sykes initially concluded that the Celts, Romans, Anglo-Saxons and Vikings had left effectively no trace in our gene pool.

This could fit in with the theories of some modern archaeologists, who maintain that 'Celtic' was in fact a cultural, rather than an ethnic, wave. Similiarly, some believe that the later Germanic invasions in fact involved a tiny warrior elite imposing massive cultural and linguistic change on the natives, just as happened after 1066.

There are, however, two other ways in which to explain the lack of genetic impact made by the invasions which liberals love to claim show how we're a "nation of immigrants." The first is that these studies involve Mitocondriachal DNA, handed down only via the female line.

If the overwhelming number of the ancient invaders were young males in war bands, who subsequently took native girls as slaves or wives, then the newcomers' DNA would indeed be 'invisible' in this particular study. The second possibility - now made more likely by Professor Syke's latest discovery - that virtually everyone in Europe is descended from just six individual women - is that the Celts, Romans, Angles and so on were in any case genetically identical to their cousins who had arrived in our lands in earlier waves of settlement.

In all probability, the forthcoming completion of the human genome project will very soon answer these detailed questions once and for all. What is already certain is that this massive scientific survey will confirm what British nationalists such as Mr. Bean have said for decades - that the European settlers who time has welded into the intimately related nations of Britain were, right from the start, merely different tribes of the same people.

SIR: I cannot be alone in being sickened by the rap music played in so many shops these days. I cannot be the only person who is offended by that bank advertisement which shows a mixed-race child on a bed with its white mother. I cannot be alone in having changed the brand of coffee I buy after my old brand's manufacturers decided to use a black footballer with an appalling disciplinary record to advertise their product.

No, I'm sure that every BNP member, and many of the huge numbers of sympathisers who now visit our websites feel the same way.

So isn't it about time that these many thousands of people started to complain and to take our custom elsewhere?

Ask the shop assistants to turn the noise down, and complain politely but loudly to the manager.

Change banks - and tell them why. Leave that jar of coffee on the shelf and buy another one instead.

We are all consumers, so we all have power in the consumer society.

I urge all readers to join the British National Party and help to give this once noble land back to its people.

But whether active members or not, every single one of us can do something, every day, to help fight the enforced imposition of the multiracial 'experiment'.

A true English nationalist is a British nationalist

A personal contribution to the debate on the rise of English nationalism

by John Bean

BELOW: John Bean. Former leader of the 1960's British National Party.

THE Eurocrats of Brussels have decreed that Britain's once United Kingdom shall be emasculated so that it can be more easily absorbed into their new European dictatorship - ruled by unelected bureaucrats and financed by the global money power. To achieve this they have been prominent in promoting Scottish and Welsh 'nationalism', particularly by dangling 'regional aid' carrots. It is not for nothing that the phoney 'nationalist' leaders of both movements advocate complete independence from Britain and in its stead want their nations to become minor states in the European Union, where the historic people of Scotland and Wales will find themselves perpetually outvoted and with far less power than they have in the United Kingdom.

There are now stirrings in England where some with good intentions, and others with a devious game to play, are wrapping themselves in the folds of the St. George's Cross. The well intentioned do so for two reasons. First, they feel that it is wrong that almost 100 Scottish and Welsh MPs (mainly Labour) should be making decisions in Parliament on purely English issues, when Scotland and Wales now have their own Assemblies. Right they say! Let us have an English Assembly, or even Parliament.

Secondly, many original Britons living in England no longer recognise the England they once knew, as they become a minority in area after area as the result of 50 years of ever increasing immigration.

Once settled down, the immigrants or their descendants become 'British'. Thus, the descendants of the original inhabitants understandably prefer to distinguish themselves by calling themselves 'English'. They feel that "whites also have rights" and hope that they can achieve this by ditching the Union Jack and uplifting the Cross of St. George. As a result of the initial success of the Scottish and Welsh Nationalists, stemming from New Labour's support for the break-up of the United Kingdom in order to get us locked into the Eurostate, there are some disgruntled Tories and UK Independence Party supporters who are calling for an independent England. Those with healthy instincts, but perhaps with limited political horizons, would like it to be truly independent; even if it meant that we would be just another Switzerland, although slightly larger. Others see it as another European region, and others, such as the UKIP, see our future locked into the global economy of the multinationals and international finance. Some 'independence'!

Past arrogance

The rise of Scottish and Welsh nationalism has been aided by a natural resentment over the diminishing of Scottish and Welsh cultures as a result of the close proximity of the more numerous English.

Too often in the past English arrogance has referred to 'England' when it meant 'Britain'. On the international sports scene supporters of the English teams would appropriate the Union Flag, actually thinking it stood for England - much to the annoyance of Scots and Welsh sports fans.

Even in history, to give but one example, we are told of the English longbowmen who won our victories at Agincourt and Crecy, when they were in fact mainly Welshmen! Perhaps because they mainly wore kilts, the heroic Scottish soldiers who played such a prominent part in winning the British Empire, have always been recognised as Scots.

The unfortunate fact is that as a result, and as Britain became more enfeebled, many Scots and Welsh, like many Irish, have developed an antipathy towards England that borders on hatred - although this is rarely reciprocated by the English.

The reality, though, is that there is no such thing as an English race, any more than there is a Scottish, Welsh or Irish race. We who live in these British Isles - and who are less than one 60th of the world's population - were (until recently) an admixture of the related tribes of North Western Europe - a common race. This mixture of primarily Celts, Anglo-Saxons and Vikings, differs in each of the individual British nations and over three millennia has led to our different, but kindred cultures. It would appear to me that the British National Party respects and wishes to preserve our different cultures - our ways of life, as do the true nationalists of England, Scotland, Wales, Ulster and Ireland. The threat to our cultures comes from diluting them internally by the rise of foreign cultures, and externally by those who wish to absorb us into a wider Europe as a stepping stone to a one-world culture. That must be why more and more nationalists who can see beyond their noses recognise that the protection of all our cultures lies in a greater British nationalism.

This does not preclude us knocking ten barrels out of each other at our great football and rugby tournaments! But when we have wiped away our blood and tended to our bruises, we must hang together, or as once proud nations we will hang individually. That's what the multiculturalists are planning for us.

BNP

The lady who made it possible

NICK GRIFFIN salutes a loyal friend of the British National Party

WHEN New Labour was forced to allow an election address freepost in London, but the old parties then tried to keep out the BNP by arranging that only candidates for the position of London mayor would be entitled to one, it became obvious that the party simply had to stand. Contesting only the party list election had been our plan up until then. With deposits of £10,000 for the mayoral election, £5,000 for the party list election, and a £10,000 contribution required towards the cost of producing the election address booklet, however, it was obvious that this would stretch us to the limit.

Since the leadership election at the start of last October, we had already been able to accumulate a 'war-chest' of about £15,000, but the task of raising at least an extra £10,000 in just a matter of days - while at the same time taking on a mountain of extra work preparing for such a big electoral effort - looked daunting indeed. But the opportunity was so great that it had somehow to be done. And then, in what was surely an Act of Providence, a letter arrived out of the blue from a solicitor, containing a cheque for £25,000! This was the result of an extremely generous bequest from Mrs. Judith Brookes, late of Chorley Manor in Worcestershire. Judith, and her late husband, were long-time supporters of the British nationalist cause. I first came to know this charming, gentle, lady several years ago when, despite her own battle with cancer, she wrote me a most touching letter and sent a generous donation to help with my legal tussle with the Race Thought Crimes Gestapo.

We met subsequently at several BNP meetings and social occasions, and she was always both dedicated and full of hope for the future, despite the fact that various doctors and specialists had told her that she should by rights have died already!

One had said that her active devotion to politics was the only thing he could think of that was keeping her going.

Despite this rather gloomy prognosis, Judith made for several years a most remarkable recovery. When she attended our West Midlands St. George's Day Dinner last year, she was her normal, lively self and a picture of good health. Like her many friends in the party, I was therefore shocked and saddened when she finally lost her personal fight on the 1st of July last year. And yet, in the political fight which she cared about so passionately, Judith Brookes was still to make a huge difference at a most crucial time. The full extent of our advance in London on May 4th is covered elsewhere in this issue, so I will say no more about it, other than to salute Judith Brookes as the lady without whom it quite possibly could not have been done.

In addition, thanks to Judith's devotion to the British National Party, we have emerged from our successful campaign with our 'war-chest' still very much intact. This means that the impact of her generosity will continue to be felt directly for a long time into the future. And, in the long term - provided we all strain every sinew to follow up on this success - by coming to our aid at such a critical moment, she may well have made all the difference. Thank you, Judith. We will never forget.

Booming membership, first class website, up and coming publicity material, the Young BNP is..

BNP Circle news

Making headway!

Report by Paul Golding

THE YOUNG BNP is booming! Set up at the beginning of the year, it has until now had to take something of a back seat because of the party's need to concentrate on the run-up to the May elections. But by the end of this summer the Young BNP will be completely operational in terms of administration, organisation and publicity material.

Our external potential is tremendous. In a recent survey amongst young people, not one thought it right for the government and the EU to attack the Austrian Freedom Party. At the once very left-wing University of East Anglia, 850 students signed a petition to protest against the Student Union's decision to censor the university magazine when it ran an interview with a local British National Party organiser. Of course, this doesn't mean that they necessarily supported the BNP, but the fact that so many were prepared to stand up for our right to speak shows just how much the attitude of the young is shifting in our favour. Such an event would have been unthinkable ten years ago.

The Young BNP is planning to launch a schools campaign at the beginning of the next term (end of summer) with the Young BNP's newly created "alternative national curriculum." Entitled Wot Skool Won't Tell U, this will be a collection of pamphlets dealing with different subjects such as white slavery, Martin Luther King, and multiculturalism.

Also under discussion is the idea of producing an introduction to real British history, which would aim to balance the way in which left-wing educationalists distort, ignore or belittle so many things which, properly taught, would give young people healthy and legitimate pride in the achievements of our ancestors. We would be very interested in hearing from anyone - perhaps a nationalist teacher who would like a way to make a silent but effective protest at the contents of the National Curriculum - who would be willing to help with the research and writing of such a publication.

All these publications will, in due course, also be put on the Internet. Even now, the Young BNP's cyberspace operation is one of the best political sites on the world-wide web. The site now incorporates the best in flash movie technology and has already received good publicity, including television coverage on HTV and a half page in a Welsh newspaper. The site includes extensive military, historic and cultural history material, as well as the features normally associated with political websites. The Young BNP has also created a Mock Election Pack available on demand for pupils interested in standing as BNP candidates in the school elections that are a part of the newly introduced citizenship lessons.

The Young BNP is an integral part of the main party, but has its own constitution and, in due course, will have its own officials and national and local organisation. The foundations of a serious nationalist youth movement have already been laid. Just how long it takes to build now depends largely on the young people already involved with the British National Party, but the Young BNP has got off to a good start, and you will be hearing a lot more about this section of the party before the end of the year.

Remember the British National Party in your will!

AT A number of critical points in its history, the British National Party has received timely boosts thanks to bequests from members and supporters who have passed on. While we wish all our people good health and the longest possible lives, it is only realistic to accept that "we've all got to go sometime." And it is also sensible for dedicated nationalists to give some thought as to whether, having made due arrangements in their wills to secure the future of their immediate family, their estate is large enough to enable them to leave something to help in the continuing struggle to secure a future for our race and nation as a whole. Even those without valuable assets can help by taking out an additional life assurance policy, especially for younger people these can provide many thousands of pounds of cover for only a few pounds a month.

The BNP's constitution now contains a provision which provides the party with a Bequest's Trust Board. This consists of the national chairman and treasurer at any given time, and a third senior party official appointed by the elected chairman. This arrangement has been double-checked with our legal advisors to ensure that it meets all the requirements so that bequests left to the trustees on behalf of the British National Party are both beyond question and guaranteed to go exclusively for the benefit of the BNP.

The precise form of words which should be inserted in your will to ensure that your bequest will be dealt with as you wish is available on request from The Bequest Trustees, PO Box 25352, London, NW5 2FE. It is very important that this advice is heeded, because an incorrect form of words could lead to your will being contested by relatives or disallowed by the state. If you have already made a will in favour of the British National Party, you are therefore also asked to get in touch via the address above so that the wording can be doublechecked.

Whatever happens to us as individuals, the fight for a British Britain for our descendants goes on. Make up your mind to keep on playing a role in that fight long after you have gone.

Race Against Time

FOR MANY years, the official propaganda line of the multiracists was that "immigration is very low". We were told repeatedly that "the numbers involved will always be so small that there will be no fundamental change to our society." Now that it has emerged that London's ethnic minority vote is "one third and rising", however, and with immigration disguised as asylum seeking at an all-time high, the "minimal immigration" line is becoming more and more untenable. So now the propagandists of the multicult 'experiment' are taking a new tack. Articles have appeared in all the 'heavyweight' newspapers about how the falling birth rates and rapidly ageing populations of Britain and other Western countries mean that we are going to have to let in many millions more immigrants - or go without pensions when we get older. The multicultists are particularly impressed with a report by the United Nations Population Division. Entitled Replacement Migration - this argues that the combination of a shrinking workforce and a soaring number of pensioners will make it impossible for the former to support the latter. In order just to maintain the present EU workforce, the UN estimates that the European Union 'needs' 1.4 million immigrants a year - 80 million by 2050. To keep the support ratio (the number of workers to pensioners) steady, we 'need' 13 million immigrants per year. This would be 701 million by 2050, which would mean that Europe's population would by then be 75% made up of people of post-1945 immigrant descent. 'Replacement' migration indeed - they want to replace us!

This new argument in favour of mass immigration has also been taken up by several well-known Establishment journalists. Anatole Kaletsky, for example, had this to say in The Times on May 11th as he attacked what he called "hysteria in Britain over bogus asylum seekers and illegal immigrants":-

"The people born in the post-war baby boom are ageing and some are beginning to retire. This is resulting in a slow but steady shrinkage of the native-born labour force in every advanced industrialised country. This inexorable demographic change will make large scale immigration inevitable eventually in every rich country, in order to support the vast cohorts of pensioners who will be retiring over the next 30 years." "Mass immigration", concludes Kaletsky, "will become an idea whose time has come." Another enthusiast for mass immigration is Jeremy Harding, author of The Uninvited: Refugees at the Rich Man's Gate, a pro-immigration book that has been favourably reviewed throughout the left-wing press. He argues that the distinction between 'good' asylum seekers genuinely fleeing persecution, and 'bogus' ones seeking economic benefit is unreal. To Harding, and to the liberal journalists like Neil Ascherson who gush over his book, immigration on such a vast scale that it will transform our society is something to be welcomed.

Harding is bitterly critical of even the feeble attempts that have been made to control the 'refugee' flood, attacking an alleged 'Fortress Europe' policy as a "dreary pastoral fantasy, in which the European Union resembles an Alpine valley surrounded by impregnable, snow-capped mountains." Ascherson picks up the simile enthusiastically, concluding his own review in The Observer by gloating that:

"In the end, legally or illegally, the rest of the world is going to get into this Sound of Music valley of ours."

Of course, all these multicult left-liberals make some attempt to conceal their ideological and psychological motivations for favouring the destruction of the West by rehashing the half-baked statistics of similarly motivated groups such as the United Nations bureaucrats already quoted. The weakness of their statistical and economic arguments have, however, been thoroughly exposed by various genuine experts, including the Oxford University geographer and demographics expert David Coleman.

Coleman's best demolition to date of the UN 'replacement migration' fantasy appeared in the Toronto-based National Post on 31st March. He points out, for example, that countries like Britain had a support ratio of 12 workers to every retired person in 1900, but that increased productivity has allowed us to reduce this ratio to just three or four workers for every pensioner today. With ever-increasing mechanisation and computerisation, there is no reason why the ratio cannot be reduced further.

Furthermore, 10 per cent of continental Europe's workforce is unemployed, while Britain encourages/forces huge numbers of middle aged men to take "early retirement" in order to push down the unemployment figures. In any case, the vast majority of immigrants are young adults, only a few years younger than the average age of the host populations, so they in turn would all too quickly 'need' even more immigrants to look after them as well.

The Oxford University expert reaches a very different conclusion to the left-liberal partisans of mass immigration: "The roots cause of excessive population ageing is very low birth rates. An effective response must make the workplace, the tax and welfare system and gender relations as a whole more favourable to women, so they can fulfil ambitions, repeatedly stated, to have more than one child... Look after women, and population will look after itself. The 'easy' option of encouraging even more immigration is short-term opportunism. It evades hard decisions and ignores harmful consequences." The truth is, why "import" millions of immigrants when we have five million workers in this country unemployed!

This is, of course, obvious to anyone with a modicum of commonsense but, unfortunately, this is not a commodity with which the liberal-left have ever been well endowed. After all, the present advocates of mass immigration and multiculturalism are, by and large, the same kind of people as used to regard the global victory of Communism as both inevitable and desirable!

In the end, their juvenile intellectual enthusiasm for the fundamentally impractical and anti-human dogma of Marxism was shattered on the rocks of human nature, and about the only aspects of their 'inevitable' system which survive today are huge mass graves and an assortment of environmental disasters.

Unfortunately, the results of their equally insane crusade for universal equality through mass immigration and racial integration will be even worse. A whole raft of demographic studies confirms the message of the United Nations report: On present trends, the nations of the West - the sine qua non of technological civilisation - will have passed the point of biological no return within just fifty years.

The only word for this is genocide but, make no mistake, the likes of Kaletsky, Harding and Ascherson are looking forward to it. It is true that part of the reason for the worldwide rush towards a genetic and cultural Babel is purely economic. Global capitalism thrives on the breaking down of traditional barriers to rapid and maximum profits, and corporate think-tanks like the Ford Foundation are undoubtedly encouraged in their enormous funding of multicult causes by the fact that they provide a spurious intellectual justification for the destruction of national and ethnic identities which might otherwise take preference over the financial interests of the multi-nationals. But the majority of individual multicult enthusiasts are motivated either by psychological quirks created by their own position as minorities of one kind or another, or by ideological dogma.

This is why there is no arguing with these people. And it is why there is no possibility of their stopping the multicult project, however obvious it becomes that it has been a disaster. In fact, the more trouble, suffering and heartache it produces for ordinary people - white and non-white alike - the more hysterical they will become about 'racism' and the need to dismantle what is left of our traditional society and values. At least, now, no one can say that we weren't warned.

The plan to turn a fifty-year tide of mainly 'legal' immigration into an uncontrolled flood of asylum seekers is being printed openly in the leftist broadsheets. These people mean business, they've already changed the face of many of our bigger cities, and now they mean to finish the job. And finish it they will - unless many more ordinary people organise politically to stop them. We don't have much longer, but the rapid growth of nationalist movements all over Europe shows that, once the forces of white ethnic survival get their act together and give back hope to our demoralised populations, we don't need much time. This is just as well, for in another twenty years or so it will be too late.

We in the British National Party are getting our act together, and more and more people are finding out that there is still hope. But it is still a race against time, and we need your help to win it.

CLIVE POTTER and JULIAN BATES argue for a nationalist writers' circle

THE IDEAS and practices known as Political Correctness (PC) have gained a deep hold in the Western world. And nowhere is PC more powerful than its command of the cultural machinery that controls the flow of information within society.

PC combines extremist versions of feminism, multiculturalism, anti-white racism and homophilia ('gay' propaganda). Its core value is obsessive egalitarianism, which leads its adepts to see non-whites, non-European cultures, non-racist women and homosexuals as superior to straight white males.

As a result, we now have a system of institutionalised hate against whites, men, heterosexuals and British history and culture. The government and establishment are both penetrated by and frightened of PC. They have become hostages to the many pressure groups and institutions which have been taken over by the left-liberal coalition. Even traditionally conservative institutions such as the police have now become active promoters of PC.

In the face of this cancer, nationalists have for too long been passive moaners. Although PC is a deadly attack on our cultural and ethnic survival, we have tended to take a defeatist attitude when it comes to formulating a strategy to fight it. Yet if nationalists cannot make a decisive stand against PC, how can we expect others to stand up and fight it? The British National Party must therefore lead the fight to oppose PC at every turn.

Striking at the heart of the machine

At the heart of the PC machine is the media and advertising industries. These are the twin pillars of the new establishment that have swallowed the most PC poison, and the ones best placed to spew it into the face of the public. If we are to stop this wearing our people down, we need to present an effective answer to the insidious PC propaganda that confronts us every time we listen to the radio, switch on the TV, or open a newspaper.

A nationalist writers' circle would provide the foundation from which to launch a fightback against the images, and subtle and not so subtle messages, that are daily flooding our senses. The advertising industry in particular has recently produced a rapid and growing use of interracial couples. This trend both reflects and reinforces the imposed reality of the multiracial experiment, as Orwellian brainwashing is used to ensure that such unnatural and unacceptable values are adopted by a growing proportion of the population.

The nationalist writers' circle would consist of members and supporters from all over the country who would be contacted whenever a programme or advertisement was shown that was particularly offensive or dangerous to the culture and identity of the British people. Circle members would also advise its organisers if they became aware of anything which they felt the circle should act upon.

The circle would differ from the British National Party's existing Media Monitoring Unit in that the MMU is concerned with acting defensively against media assaults on the BNP itself, whereas the nationalist writers' circle would aim to take the offensive in a cultural war of attrition, working to undermine PC by going for the jugular of the companies using it - the fear of losing money.

Of course, we cannot change the minds of the internationalist 'elite' types who finance and control large sectors of the advertising industry. They are too set in their nation-wrecking ways to stop trying to destroy national identities through economic power and cultural manipulation. Similarly, whatever we say will make no difference to the 'ex'-Marxists who dominate advertising middle management. These individuals abandoned the economic aspects of their student union radicalism as soon as they started drawing juicy salaries, but they are still committed to the social agenda of Marxism.

Consumers have the power

But whatever the PC advertising companies want to do, they can only do it if their clients say 'yes'. Yet capitalist companies are unusually vulnerable to public pressure as they operate in a commercial environment where the consumer has increasing power in a crowded market place.

Especially when advertising costs are so high, a company whose products or services are being promoted on an anti-white, anti-male, anti-family, anti-heterosexual or anti-British agenda, could be persuaded to change its approach if it thinks it is alienating potential customers. Company decision-makers are very vulnerable to what appears to be spontaneous public pressure. The point is to ensure that this 'spontaneity' is informed, organised and focused.

This can be done by involving in the circle not just hardcore BNP activists, but also passive members and supporters, including the elderly and disabled, who might otherwise find it had to take on a positive role within our overall battle. Party members who live in isolated areas or in places where there is at present no established group may also like to play their part.

We propose that any individual who is interested should donate a minimum of six first class stamps to start with. This will allow the circle organisers to contact the volunteers whenever an issue or an advertisement appears which is bad enough to warrant a response.

Every circle volunteer will receive details of the item to be complained about, suggestions for lines of attack, and addresses to which complaints should be sent. When each volunteer's last stamp is used, the last bulletin would include a reminder for them to send a further supply of stamps.

Putting it all together

We are currently devising a short 'How to' guide, explaining the best way to go about complaining about an offensive item.

This will encourage our complainants to write expressing their dissatisfaction to targeted companies or boradcasting stations as individual customers, not as BNP activists with a political axe to grind.

The nationalist writers' circle would be an invaluable counter-balance to the power of the left-liberal establishment and the internationalist elite. It would help to influence the cultural climate in which we operate politically, creating a virtuous cycle as we grow and in turn become better able to apply pressure against PC propaganda.

The battle against the false economic dogma of Marxism is over and won. The scientists opposed to egalitarianism are winning the ideological war against the equality cult.

The BNP is already fighting the political war, and is making progress here as well. But the cultural war is vitally important too. PC is corroding our institutions and way of life at all levels - within our schools and universities, our councils, police, judiciary, social services, advertising and the media. Our writers' circle can quietly help to alter the cultural climate and make it more conducive to our long march to power.

The idea for the nationalist writers' circle sprang from our feelings of frustration at seeing so many anti-white adverts on TV, often portraying white males as inferior and non-whites as superior, and glamourising inter-racial relationships. Having formulated this plan of response, we struggled for a while to think of an appropriate name for the circle. Immediately after an unfruitful discussion on this subject, one of us sat on a bus and noticed a woman nearby wearing an unusual and ornate headband. It depicted an angel blowing a long trumpet - a call to arms and a rallying cry, a revelation! This, we realised, was the right image to portray the intention of our circle.

Revelations, the nationalist writers' circle, is dedicated to exposing the lies and distortions of the left-liberals, and to encouraging people to stand up and make their rejection of this poison known. Like the biblical Revelations, the message of nationalism to our enemies is that "the time is at hand" - the time when nationalism will emerge as a powerful and liberating force throughout our land.

Solidarity!

Friendship between British and Southern African Whites

Solidarity is a project aimed at strengthening the links between our racial brothers in Southern Africa, including Zimbabwe (formerly Rhodesia), South Africa etc. In the event of a general upheaval in Southern Africa, the British supporters of Solidarity will offer refugee assistance. A few projects are being arranged:

- Short-term accommodation in Britain for South Africans and other Whites on that continent in the event of a general upheaval.

- Pen-pals in SA and the motherland of Britain will be put in touch with each other.

As Solidaity is still in its infancy, any practical suggestions will be welcome.

Patriotic Students' Association Formed

Ian King

AT LAST! An organisation has been formed to represent the growing number of students involved in nationalist politics. The Patriotic Students' Association (PSA) is an organisation run by students for students, with the aim of promoting nationalist politics in our nation's universities.

The PSA is independent of all political parties, but makes no secret of the fact that it supports the BNP. We have contact with a number of patriotic student organisations abroad, and we are always willing to cooperate with like-minded groups at home and abroad.

The stereotype of all students being unwashed left-wing ANL types is now well and truly outdated, and the potential for us that exists is immense; the positive response which we have received so far only goes to prove this.

As for our aims, we will be doing all we can to promote our national and cultural identity in our universities. We believe that all the world's many peoples and cultures should have their place under the sun - and that this is ours. We will defend the traditional British value of freedom of speech, and actively oppose those who wish to take it away, whether from us or from anybody else. The Patriotic Students' Association will campaign against the destruction of the environment, and oppose the tyranny of global capitalism.

These two related issues have largely been hijacked by the left, but we aim to restore the balance. We oppose cruelty to animals in all its forms, from vivisection through to the barbaric practices of halal and kosher ritual slaughter, which are quite rightly already banned in various other civilised European countries. We oppose the domination of British affairs by foreign powers, whether in the form of a federal European superstate or an imperialistic United States and its lapdog NATO. As Plato asserted: "One of the penalties for refusing to participate in politics is that you end up being governed by your inferiors." How true this has been in our universities in recent times! Large scale apathy has allowed the most repulsive and unrepresentative anti-British leftwingers to wield power in many Student Unions throughout the country. These cranks have been able to turn all sorts of undemocratic and politically correct nonsense into 'union policy'. This too is something we are in the process of putting right. We are taking steps to get involved in the running of our Student Unions, and we will do all we can to motivate the great silent majority of students to do the same. The Plato quote says it all. This is why patriotically-minded students must stand in elections to gain sabbatical positions in our universities - positions with real decision-making power, positions which we will use to improve conditions for all students, rather than as a platform for crackpot PC propaganda.

A large proportion of our output will be Internet-based. We will soon have our own PSA website up and running. This will keep our supporters up to date with current affairs items which they may have missed (or which, more likely, have been hushed up), provide links to other like-minded groups, and provide an e-bulletin service. We are also in the process of building up a historical archive which students will be able to access through our website. This service will also be available to young BNP members. Maybe you're writing an essay about the Russian Revolution and want to know more about this than they'll tell you in your school textbooks? Then the PSA archive will be the place to look!

So that's a very brief introduction to our organisation. We hope that all patriotic students will get in touch and help us to progress further. The idea that British universities are a 'no-go' area for patriots is outdated, so if you are a student searching for an organisation which embodies healthy values, then look no further. The Patriotic Students' Association exists for people like you, and we are on the rise. Join us!

The first Patriotic Students' Association bulletin is now out! Compulsory reading for all sane students, but interesting for all nationalists. ABOVE: The Patriotic Students' Association would oppose the wasting of money on such politically correct showcases as this 'anti-racism' conference, which neither addresses the problem of anti-white racism, nor the inherent unworkability of our present multicultural society
